Sixteenth Street Community Health Centers has long recognized that socio-economic factors — such as income, education, employment, public safety and housing — all contribute to quality and length of life. Which is why for 50 years, our work has been guided by the belief that:

Everyone has the right to high quality, accessible healthcare that is free from linguistic, cultural and economic barriers

Care must be delivered beyond our clinic walls in order to give individuals and families the support, services and self-empowerment they need to make wellness a sustainable reality

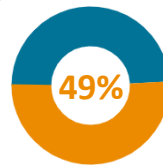

Building healthy communities means more than healthcare; it means narrowing health disparities and access gaps and improving the environment where people live, learn, work and play

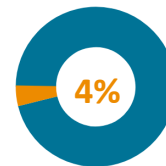

Through our medical and behavioral health care, enabling services, involvement in the community, and collaboration and coordination with partners, we work to engage families from populations that are typically difficult to reach.
